BRITAIN'S PLAN TO ARM CARGO SHIPS RESTS ON LEGALITY GALICIA OFFENSIVE

Armament at Halifax or Bermuda.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 29 .- The proposal which the British authorities are said to have in mind to arm about ward withdrawing to the original fight the German submarines has by the Turks were twice repulsed. aroused speculation here as to the legality of the move. According to the plan ships plying between American and British ports will go into Hanfax or Bermuda on their way to New York, dismantling their forward guns, and come to New York under torpedo boat destroyer convoy, replacing their guns at Hallfax or Bermuda on their outbound

John Bassett Moore's International treatises, which generally have been a basis for international rulings, declare transformation of a ship at sea from a peaceful merchantman to a ship offensively armed is not legal. This question has arisen in the matter of prizes captured by the German sea reider in South Atlantic waters and said to have been transformed into other raiders at sea. While this Government has made no ruling in these cases, Secretary Lansing has explained this Government does not countenance such transformations as

Further armament of British ships, including guns forward, will not necessarily mean this Government will recognize them as subject to submarine attack without warning, it was said at the State Department to-day.

For the time being, the Department stated, this Government will stand pat on its decision regarding the armed ships, published last winter, and just before Germany announced it would attack all merchant ships regardless of armament.

The "purpose or intent" of the armament, as well as its character, would have to be considered in each pecific case.

It is understood the Department considers the whole armed ship question an open one, and if a change in the character of merchant armament is made, the department may issue new port regulations.

Under the decision embodied in the Memorandum Issued on March 31 last, the nature of the armament, whether offensive or defensive, is made to rest entirely on presumption of intention. This presumption, it is admitted, may be decidedly changed by the increasing need of defense against German submarines through the adoption by the latter of the use of gunfire as well as torpedoes.

The German diplomats here assert ing of guns fore and aft wil be taken by Austria-Hungary and to-day handed to United States Am Germany as prima facie evidence that bassador Gerard its answer in the case they are armed for offense as well as defense. Under that category they says an Overseas News Agency an will be classed as enemy warships and sunk without warning, without effort to stop and search and without attempting to give the crews time to take to lifeboats.
